Sarah:

Thanks for joining. Let's jump in. First, we need a final prototype of the voice assistant ready by June 5. Javier, that's on your team, right?

Javier:

Yes, but we're hitting some snags. The voice detection model is misfiring with non-native accents, and the API integration with Whisper is still unstable.

Sarah:

Can we flag that? Sounds like a risk. Can you deliver a patch by next Friday, May 23?

Javier:

I'll check with Anna and Lee, but that's tight. Let's say tentatively yes.

Tom:

Also, I need to raise something. The training data used for the transcription model includes samples from internal Zoom calls—some of which, I just found out, include client-sensitive conversations that were never anonymized. This might breach our data compliance policy.

Rachel:

Wait, what? That could be a huge problem if that got out.

Sarah:

That's... not good. Tom, can you open a ticket on that and escalate to compliance today?

Tom:

Will do. I'll mark it as critical.

Priya:

From design, we're still waiting on final user feedback from the early-access group. We've only heard from 3 of the 10 testers so far.

Sarah:

Who owns that follow-up?

Rachel:

I thought DevRel was handling it?

Sarah:

Let's not assume. Rachel, can you reach out to the DevRel team and push for responses by Monday, May 19?

Rachel:

Got it.

Priya:

Also, the new interface you asked for—voice commands in dark mode—won't be ready for the June launch unless we scale back gesture support.

Sarah:

Understood. Let's prioritize voice over gestures. Please send me an updated scope doc by Wednesday, May 21.

Javier:

One more thing—we just realized the voice assistant logs everything, even outside scheduled meetings. That includes personal conversations caught during testing. Some were... pretty private.

Sarah:

Okay... that's a major issue. Let's halt all data collection until we fix the privacy settings. Who can own that?

Javier:

I'll assign it to Lee. We'll disable logging by EOD today.

Sarah:

Perfect. Thanks. Last thing—team offsite planning. Has anyone booked the venue?

Rachel:

Oops... I thought we agreed on Denver, but apparently no one confirmed it. Flights are now 40% higher.

Sarah:

Alright. Action item—Rachel, find alternative cities and send options to the group by Tuesday, May 20. We're not paying that premium.
